Description

Say Joe is English, but he can read French and Spanish. He gets to a page which is out of date, compared to English and French. Right now, he does not get any information telling him to go to French or Spanish instead, except if one of the updates has been the subject of an urgent translation request.

It would be nice if there was a notice at the top of the page saying something like this:

The English version of this page is only 87% up to date.

Some of the missing information is considered critical (urgent translation request issued).

Up to date information is available in the following languages: French, Spanish.

To get a machine generated translation of an up to date version from another language, click here (Warning: the quality of the translation may not be good).

Note: Clicking on the Machine translation link would show the out of date English page and the MT into English side by side, so that the user could refer back to the proper (but incomplete) English version if necessary.
