Description
    PluginLayout assumes there will be one content area in the foreground and one full-width background area behind the content. To create a full-width area for the page background image, PluginLayout changes `div class="container"` to `div class="container-fluid"`.

    But for some page content layouts, the page backgrounds, etc. are full-width, but the text content is limited to the normal container width (1270px or whatever) in (vertically) alternating sections of the page, like on http://demo.zukathemes.com/Happy+Scroll.

    The layout on that page starts out with a full-width page to get the wide backgrounds behind the headings. Then `div.container` is used in the sections with columns of text. But with the plugin currently, every instance of `container` gets changed by the plugin to `container-fluid`.

    Setting the "contentwidth" parameter to 80% or whatever doesn't help because this also limits the width of the section background images.

    It would be good if only the outermost instances of `div class="container"` were changed by the plugin (not the nested or child instances), so any instances of `div class="container"` in the wiki text wouldn't be touched by the plugin - they would remain `div class="container"`. This would enable alternating sections of full-width backgrounds and container-limited content on the page.

    (Of course I'm open to other ways of achieving the same result with this plugin, if there's a better/easier way.)
