Description

There might be many emails from the bug tracker in dev.t.o (like in other tiki sites with heavy activity in one or several trackers).

Notification emails come with this type of common subject:

"[Bugs & Wish list] (Tracker was modified at dev.tiki.org by userfoo)"

And content of the changed item brings the changed fields, but if there is no change in the title of the bug tracker (the first "isMain" field), the user getting the message still has no clue about the changed item.

Proposed solution:

- Add a new option in trackers to include the first "isMain" field (the first field linked to the full item view) in:
 1. the notification email subject first, before or instead the string needed for email filters "".
 2. the content of all emails from changes in items from that tracker

This would allow people like me, to clearly identify in which tracker items I'm requested to take some action, or help on the follow up on some topics, when you get many emails from the same source and currently with too similar subjects.

Yes, I get confused in Gmail as well when it aggregates many different threads all together. Having some way of making sure they don't all get bundled up would be nice
