Description

To use Tiki as a real content management system where people can add or change wiki pages securely, it will be a feature, if they (compared to mediawiki or wikipedia) first can store changes or new wiki pages as a draft. A chief editor checks it before it will be published. If it is possible to add this feature, I promise there is no reason left to choose mediawiki as a software.

The process could be:

1. somebody changes content in a wiki page or adds a new wiki page. Changes will not be visible to everybody but the admin and the chef editor.
2. admin and chief editor will be informed about changes automatically
3. admin or chief editor check the content
4. if admin or chief edito agree they will publish the changes
5. if admin or chief editor do not agree they will not publish it and contact the editopr.

I am creating a huge portal with tiki as an alternative to wikipedia. Unfortunately I found out too late that this feature is missing. I can imagine the usability of tiki will be increased tremendously if this feature will bne available.

Hi Arthur,
it sounds to me what you are requesting is already an existing feature:
<https://doc.tiki.org/Flagged+Revisions>
So no need to request it again 😊.

HTH,
luci

It works. I have 3 questions left:
Is there a way to approve all the pages at once?
There is no button for disapproval a changement isn't it?
What's about notification of changings?
Beyond that it is a fine feature.
regards Arthur

Who is able to read has a better life 😊
Found everything in the article you quoted. All the questions are answered.
Thanks for support

Thanks a lot for this hint Luci. Seems it exactly was what I am looking for. I'll try to implement it.
regards Arthur
