Description
- Tiki lets us configure min_username_length and max_username_length unless we select login_is_email
- If we select login_is_email, these configs are hidden but max_username_length is still enforced in `lib/validators/validator_username.php` and in `lib/registration/registrationlib.php`

The database structure seems to let us have as many as 191 chars without an issue. Certainly these are actually bytes, not chars.

Notes: If we use english logins or emails as logins, it's 191 characters. Accentuated chars in french and other european languages use 2 bytes (éààê). Some other languages use alphabets in which all chars use 2, 3 or 4 bytes.

My suggestion:
- Important: We should not enforce min_username_length and max_username_length when preference

login_is_email is selected.

- Nice to have: We should still have some hard limit of 191 bytes (not chars) even if login_is_email is selected (needs to be tested with utf8 characters) so that people get a nice explanation instead of a mysql error message about an insert failure.
